

9.13 Photographs<sup>1</sup>

(1) A photograph may be admitted in evidence upon a showing that it is relevant and properly identified and authenticated as a fair and accurate representation of what it purportedly depicts. Depending upon the circumstances, a photograph taken from a social media account may require an additional showing of a connection between the defendant and the social media account and the timing of the photograph's posting in relation to the event or reason for the photograph's admission in evidence.

(2) An authenticated photograph of a deceased or of an injury is admissible in the discretion of the court if it tends to prove or disprove a disputed or material issue, to illustrate or elucidate other relevant evidence, or to corroborate or disprove other evidence offered or to be offered, and if its probative value outweighs the danger of undue prejudice.

Note

Subdivision (1) is derived from People v Byrnes (33 NY2d 343, 347 [1974]) where the photographs were authenticated and admitted into evidence because the “complainant, a competent witness possessing knowledge of the matter, identified the subjects and verified that the photographs accurately represented the subject matter depicted.” Further, in a proper case, a photograph may constitute “independent probative evidence of what it shows” (Byrnes at 348, citing as an example People v Webster, 139 NY 73, 83 [1893] [photograph admitted to show physique of deceased where defendant pleaded self-defense]).

While an appropriate witness's testimony normally will establish the foundation, where “no witnesses are available who have viewed the subject matter portrayed, valid alternative grounds may exist for authenticating the photograph and admitting it into evidence, such as testimony, especially that by an expert, tending to establish that the photograph truly and accurately represents what was before the camera.” (Byrnes at 349; see People v Price, 29 NY3d 472, 477 [2017] [“ ‘since the ultimate object of the authentication requirement is to insure the accuracy of the photograph sought to be admitted into evidence, any person having the requisite knowledge of the facts may verify,’ or an expert may testify that the photograph has not been altered” (citation omitted)].)

In Price, the People failed to authenticate a photograph “from an Internet profile page allegedly belonging to defendant” by any of the traditional methods, “as the victim was unable to identify the weapon as that which was used in the robbery, and no other witnesses testified that the photograph was a fair and accurate representation of the scene depicted or that it was unaltered” (Price, 29 NY3d at 474, 477-478 [citations omitted]). Instead, the People argued that the photograph’s authenticity had been proved by evidence “that the printout of the web page is an accurate depiction thereof, and that the web page is attributable to and controlled by . . . the defendant” (id. at 478). The Court, however, held that “[a]ssuming without deciding that a photograph may be authenticated through the method proposed” or “some variation thereof,” the People failed in their proof “of defendant’s connection to the website or the particular profile.” (Id. at 478-480.)

As Price illustrates, authentication of social media photographs is an evolving area of the law that presents some concerns. For example, in People v Mayo (202 AD3d 833, 834 [2d Dept 2022]), the Court held that the People failed to properly authenticate a photograph from a Facebook account “allegedly depicting the defendant wearing certain clothing similar to that worn by the perpetrator. . . . The People’s only authentication evidence consisted of the testimony of a police witness who searched for the Facebook profile 1½ years after the crime. They did not proffer any evidence or testimony demonstrating that the photograph was ‘a fair and accurate representation of the scene depicted or that it was unaltered’. . . . To the contrary, the police witness testified that he did not know whether the photograph had been altered. Furthermore, the People did not present any evidence ‘to establish that the web page belonged to, and was controlled by, [the] defendant’ or any evidence as to when the photograph was created or posted.”

A visual representation of “text messages” may be authenticated, however, by the traditional method of authenticating photographs, that is, by evidence establishing that the visual representation of the “text messages” is a fair and accurate representation of the communication. In People v Rodriguez (38 NY3d 151 [2022]), for example, where the victim (a 15 year old) and the defendant (a 43 year old) were proved to communicate by text messages, the question was whether “screenshots” of the text messages taken by the victim’s boyfriend before the victim deleted them from her phone were admissible. The Court held that upon the victim’s identification of the “screenshots” as a fair and accurate representation of the content of the messages sent to her, they were properly authenticated and admitted in evidence.

Subdivision (2) is derived primarily from People v Poblner (32 NY2d 356, 369-370 [1973]), and its progeny. In Poblner, the Court held:

“The general rule is that photographs of the deceased are admissible if they tend to prove or disprove a disputed or material issue, to illustrate or elucidate other relevant evidence, or to corroborate or disprove some other evidence offered or to be offered. Admission of photographs of homicide victims is generally within the discretion of the trial court. Where they are otherwise properly admitted as having a tendency to prove or disprove some material fact in issue, photographs of a corpse are admissible even though they portray a gruesome spectacle and may tend to arouse passion and resentment against the defendant in the minds of the jury. There are many cases in which photographs of a homicide victim have been held admissible to show, for example, the position of the victim's body, the wounds of the victim, or to illustrate expert testimony. Photographic evidence should be excluded only if its sole purpose is to arouse the emotions of the jury and to prejudice the defendant." (Id. at 369-370 [internal quotation marks and citations omitted].)

In Pobliner, the defendant told a friend that his wife was asleep when he shot her. Four photographs were properly admitted to show that the deceased "was in her bed, in a sleeping position, when shot, thus tending to confirm" the defendant's friend's testimony; and two photographs taken at the morgue were properly admitted to "show the three clustered bullet holes near the left temple, indicating marksmanship and deliberateness in the killing." (Pobliner at 370; see People v Bell, 63 NY2d 796, 797 [1984] [photographs of a victim being attended in the hospital were admissible given that "(t)hey were not gory, the lacerations they show having either been cleaned up or bandaged, and while the knife remaining imbedded in the victim's back was startling in the sense of being unusual, the picture it presented of the knife was less unnerving than the oral testimony concerning it"]; People v Stevens, 76 NY2d 833, 836 [1990] ["The photographs of the victim's body showed the nature of the injury and therefore tended to prove that the assailant acted with intent to inflict serious injury, an essential element of the manslaughter count. The People were not bound to rely entirely on the testimony of the medical expert to prove this point and the photographs were admissible to elucidate and corroborate that testimony"]; People v Wood, 79 NY2d 958, 960 [1992] ["The nature and manner of the killing were material and relevant to prosecution of the murder indictment and the defendant could not make it otherwise by admitting that he had killed the victim but contending that he had done so under the influence of an extreme emotional disturbance. The questioned exhibits illustrated the severity and calculated nature of the wounds and tended to disprove defendant's claim that he was totally out of control at the time of the killing"]; Mazella v Beals, 27 NY3d 694, 709 [2016] [in action for malpractice by a psychiatrist, a photograph of the deceased who committed suicide "was relevant to plaintiff's theory that the violent nature of the suicide—death by self-inflicted knife wounds—was a result of decedent's extreme mental and emotional condition, induced by the long-term use of prescription drugs," and its admission was not "unduly prejudicial" because there was testimony and the autopsy report describing the body's condition].)

A portrait or photograph of a deceased taken when the deceased was alive may “arouse the jury’s emotions, particularly when they are presented in a before-and-after format, and thus should not be admitted unless relevant to a material fact to be proved at trial. In addition, the relevance of the portraits must be independently established; the fact that photographs of the victim after death have been found to be relevant does not necessarily establish the relevance, and hence admissibility, of portraits of the victim while alive.” (People v Stevens, 76 NY2d 833, 835-836 [1990]; Smith v Lehigh Val. R.R. Co., 177 NY 379, 384 [1904] [in an action to recover for pecuniary damages resulting from the decedent’s death, the introduction in evidence of the photograph of the deceased as a handsome woman when she was alive was improper]; compare People v Ramsaran, 154 AD3d 1051, 1053-1054 [3d Dept 2017] [photographs of the deceased prior to her murder “were relevant to and probative of the People’s central theory that defendant disapproved of the victim’s appearance and was motivated to kill her, in part, by his desire to be with (another woman), whose appearance he perceived as more attractive”].)
